I Thought Practicums Were Voluntary...

Friday, November 13, 2009
9:00AM to 12:00PM
Minneapolis Room

Augsburg College
Department of Social Work
Fall 2009 CEU Workshop

I Thought Practicums Were Voluntary...

This workshop introduces field instructors to concepts that inform supervisory strategies for work with involuntary clients: motivational congruence, reactance, and parallel process. With these concepts as context and using scenarios from Chapter 18: Applying the Involuntary Perspective to Supervision in Ron Rooney's 2009 second edition of Strategies for Work with Involuntary Clients (pp. 424-448), participants will explore how to apply contracting skills and address performance issues in supervising students. Issues of safety and cultural competence will also be covered, and there will be interactive opportunities for participants to share examples, raise questions, and bring up concerns emerging in practicums.

OBJECTIVES:

- Participants will learn to identify involuntary dynamics within field practicums.
- Participants will note, share and discuss potential strategies to use in their practice as field instructors.

This workshop will count toward 3.0 hours of supervision training required for social work licensure.

Dr. Tony Bibus

Tony Bibus is a professor and licensed social worker, and has trained supervisors and been involved with field instruction for twenty-five years. He is the co-author with Carol Jud of the chapter in Strategies for Work with Involuntary Clients that focuses on supervision. He has conducted many workshops and has written in the areas of field instruction, supervision, cultural competence, child welfare, family-based services, international social work, licensing and regulation of practice, welfare reform, and work with involuntary clients.
